

A Paranoid's Guide to Bugging

1. BUGS DO NOT HAVE WIRES (neither do wiretaps, mostly). They are radio transmitters, usually tiny, and microphones, usually tinier. A bug can be hidden in a vase of flowers (the microphone in the one shown was so well concealed we couldn't photograph it). It can be in a book (look in all your books; it could be in any of them, including that old biology text on the shelf there). It can be in a cigarette lighter, a cigarette box or a package of cigarettes (you can rig the pack with some real cigarettes and offer your mark a couple to divert suspicion). And it really can be in an olive in a martini.

2. ALL THE BUGS in the table pictures don't show. There's a sugar-cube-sized one under the table. Each has its own circuits, etc., and its own miniature batteries. The cigarette pack will transmit for from 10 to 20 hours to a point one or two blocks away; it depends on the receiving antenna and the construction of the building. The larger the batteries, the longer the transmitter will work and the greater its range.

3. BOTH BUGS AND SELF-CONTAINED TAPE RECORDERS can be very small. That's a bug on top of that matchbook. On our cover, Miss Yvonne D'Angers is demonstrating one of the smallest units: a stereo bra. The whole setup (declassified because a CIA agent goofed and revealed it) weighs 11 ounces and is more conventionally, but less interestingly, used in a man's inside coat pockets or in his sleeves. By standing in the right place he can pick up two conversations, one on each channel. It records for an hour and reproduces beautifully. The CIA now has a slightly smaller one with even better quality.

4. CHECK YOUR VISITOR'S FOUNTAIN PEN also (as well as his tie pin, his cuff links, etc.—or her earrings). The little gadget photographed here will turn a whisper into a recorded roar buildings away. The wire goes through a hole in the coat, the transmitter into the shirt pocket (or inside the shirt), and the antenna up around the neck.

5. THERE IS STILL NOTHING to beat a Uher recorder in a brief-
