This volume demonstrates how co-operatives can perform on equal terms with other forms of commercial organization despite the challenges faced from operating in an environment not suited to their needs. The authors examine how co-operatives perform in practice as businesses, as places to work and as vehicles for local economic development. They present the first large scale survey of co-operatives economic performance, a survey of co-operative support organizations and detailed case studies of co-operatives of different types. Finally they evaluate the main policy initiatives designed to encourage co-operative development and suggest ways in which these policies could be improved.
