Abstract

The digital transformation in higher education institutions has become one of the most significant trends in recent years. Unfortunately, this change is facing many challenges and pitfalls. Therefore, understanding how to manage digitalization amid continuous change should be a top priority for leaders of higher education institutions. This article reviews previous research focused on digitalization in higher education. Using non-systematic literature methods, it starts by summarizing the main driving forces, barriers, and pitfalls of digitalization in higher education. The selected papers were chosen based on their relevance to the article's purpose. The findings discuss the four main elements of managing digitalization in higher education. These four elements should be a priority in universities' strategy. Finally, the proposed framework in this article is expected to contribute to developing theory and practice in managing digitalization in higher education.

INTRODUCTION

Digitalization in higher education has been an essential frontline to transform education systems and services in the era of the industrial revolution 4.0. Digitalization in higher education is not just switching face-to-face learning to distance learning but also aims to enhance and transform the learning experience, enabling open and more responsive education systems (Bawang et al., 2021). For instance, digital technology can be used to deliver learning material and administration work, such as monitoring absenteeism and students' and teachers' performance. (Kilag et al., 2022; Underwood, 2009). Pu et al. (2022) even highlighted that digital transformation is a way for higher education institutions to promote sustainable development. The transition to digital education must be viewed as a long-term strategy influenced by institutional development and government policies. This strategy should include preparing the educators' knowledge and skills to meet the new challenges faced in an educational environment. Being digitally trained helps educators improve their research, communication, and assessment skills (Kilag et al., 2022). Thus, managing digitalization in higher education institutions should involve various internal and external aspects. The internal aspects are organizational culture, technological infrastructure, employee competency, and business processes (Bates, 2015). Technology implementation requires an innovative organizational culture and encourages people to take risks and learn from failures. In contrast, external aspects are government policies, industry standards, and the global market situation. For example, implementing technology into education systems involves substantial funding from the government, and in most cases, most developing countries cannot provide this funding.

In practice, one indicator that digital technology in education is becoming increasingly important and widely accepted is the increasing number of MOOC courses. A report by Class Central showed that in 2021, 40 million new learners signed up for at least one MOOC, compared to 60 million in 2020. The presence of MOOCs provides an opportunity for many people to learn in a new way. The use of technology has proven flexibility in the learning process and the opportunity to interact with trainers, educators, and classmates worldwide. The ease of the learning process also
