New Medical Technology Development and Diffusion Christopher Lau, 2014 Over the past decade the rapid pace of medical technology development has created a large array of drugs medical devices and healthcare services many of which have greatly expanded the scope of treatable diseases The diffusion of these technologies in the U S has helped countless individuals realize substantial improvements in life expectancy and overall quality of life However the development and diffusion of new medical technology have also presented several challenges for U S policy makers The three papers that comprise this dissertation examine three policy issues that center on some of these challenges The first paper examines how markets can fail to incentivize the development of new medical technology that address a public need and explore the lessons learned from the implementation of four different policy solutions The second paper examines the role of the National Institutes of Health in new medical technology development and the extent to which its research grant program has encouraged the formation of biopharmaceutical commercial alliances The last paper examines the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Service s Accountable Care Organization program and whether its participants are changing the way that new medical technologies are used and adopted Early Evaluation of New Medical Technologies Helen Mcateer,2012 Health economics provides the tools necessary to demonstrate value for money These tools are typically used by healthcare providers to drive demand side decisions i e to select or reject treatment for reimbursement However these same tools can be used by healthcare technology manufacturers and investors to inform supply side decisions i e to determine whether expected returns will outweigh expected costs In a finite resource healthcare system manufacturers need to concentrate on those products most likely to succeed in market It makes sense to assess potential cost effectiveness as early as possible demonstrating value for money during early stages of product development can be compelling evidence to attract further investment However conducting cost effectiveness analysis when a product is yet to be developed is an extremely uncertain undertaking I propose a simple approach termed the headroom method to the problem of supply side analysis This will help manufacturers avoid misguidedly investing in technologies that are unlikely to be cost effective I illustrate the headroom method using real examples from the regenerative medicine industry Adopting New Medical Technology Institute of Medicine,Committee on Technological Innovation in Medicine,1994-02-01 What information and decision making processes determine how and whether an experimental medical technology becomes accepted and used Adopting New Medical Technology reviews the strengths and weaknesses of present coverage and adoption practices highlights opportunities for improving both the decision making processes and the underlying information base and considers approaches to instituting a much needed increase in financial support for evaluative research Essays explore the nature of technological change the use of technology assessment in decisions by health care providers and federal for profit and not for profit payers the role of the courts in determining benefits coverage strengthening the connections between evaluative research and coverage decision making manufacturers responses to the increased demand for outcomes research and the implications of health care reform for technology policy Technical Appendixes to the Report and Recommendations to the Secretary, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services United States.
