Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a hair rim light on the opposite side.

Tip: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their appearing in the window in the shot. The window is to the far left of the frame, and your subject is about two-thirds of the way from the window. Instead of 10 feet, an 8-foot window might work through an 8-foot wall, too.

Set: For most window light shots, I "shoot light" on the subject on the side of their face that is closest to the window. In this case, the subject is to the far left of the frame, and you are the main light. You do this by having them turn their back towards the window and have them stand, so their back feels a little pressure without knowing their back. This helps to make your subject's face look better and to guarantee that a flaring eye does not happen in a window shot.

Set: Your subject might should be a little higher than your subject's head, so you're looking down. When you adjust your shooting, a little down on them, again for a more flattering look. Photographers for a more flattering look note that when your subject looks too white, don't have your subject face the window directly, instead have their back to the window a bit like you're shooting at their back when you are closer to the shot.
