

Defense of Marx's Labor Theory of Value: Response to Criticisms

Ricardo Alonzo Fernández Salguero

June 18, 2024

1 Introduction

Karl Marx's Labor Theory of Value (LTV) has been subject to numerous criticisms since its formulation. This theory holds that the value of a commodity is determined by the socially necessary labor time required for its production. Here, a detailed defense of the LTV is presented against contemporary criticisms, using formal logic, empirical evidence, and references to recent studies.

2 Criticism 1: Equating Commodities Without a Common Substance

2.1 Criticism

The criticism posits that it is not necessary for two commodities to share a common substance to be exchanged. It argues that direct equating between two objects can occur without the mediation of a third object. This argument is based on the observation that in many everyday exchanges, people directly equate heterogeneous objects without referring to an underlying common characteristic.

2.2 Response from the Marxist Perspective

The criticism misinterprets Marx's argument about the common substance. According to Marx, the common substance is abstract human labor. This substance does not refer to a tangible physical characteristic but to the commensurability of human labor objectified in commodities. Marx argues that for commodities to be exchanged, there must be a common basis that allows for comparison and commensuration. This basis is socially necessary labor time.

2.2.1 Foundations of the Common Substance

In Marx's theory, all commodities are products of human labor. When we say that 20 yards of linen are exchanged for 1 coat, according to Marx, we are saying
