Deliberation occurs in a diversified media landscape. Hybrid communication that combines broadcast, print, and online communication transverses social wholes, posing ever greater challenges for researchers to develop methods for capturing media-based deliberation. Traditionally, communication scholars engage with inquiry into media communication at individual, institutional, and social levels. Whereas some approaches are quantitative-oriented, including methods such as surveys, experiments, and content analyses, other approaches are qualitative-oriented, based on visual observation, interviews, discourse analysis, and historical analysis. There are, indeed, many ways to study media and deliberation.

This chapter focuses on content analysis. We define this research method briefly as the 'systematic, objective, quantitative analysis' of communication content or message characteristics (Nuendorf and Kumar 2015, 1; see also Krippendorff 2012; Neuendorf 2017; Riffe et al. 2019). This method is used for making replicable and valid inferences from written texts or transcribed speeches as well as non-textual content, such as images, graphical elements, music, and sounds. The term 'communication content', therefore, refers to a broad range of materials such as newspaper articles, speeches, advertisements, social media posts, blog or microblog texts, and so forth. The effort to identify units for building code schemes for human coding requires full specification of the set of categories. Usually, coders are trained to use categories to measure differences in content; and this training should lead to inter-coder agreement, that is, stability in the protocol application over time. Then, the analysis of relationships involving these categories is often based on statistical methods. If the categories and rules are comprehensive, they should allow replicability according to the standards of reliability; and the patterns observed are likely to be valid in a more general way when transported to different contexts (Neuendorf 2017; Krippendorff 2012). Recently, computer-aided textual analysis has enabled the coding of massive volumes of material, by accelerating data collection and reliability testing. With technological development, the use of content analysis has become more practical and opened up new venues for more sophisticated combinations of linguistic and visual cues with statistical analysis.

Our definition of content analysis works towards an integrative approach, which means combining it with methods like surveys, experiments, network analysis, and frame analysis to examine the roles that media play in deliberation in different
