

MOSLEM ARCHITECTURE

PART I

It is an old and still accepted idea that the mosque of Mohammed (570-1-632) at Medina represents, in an elementary form, the prototype of the congregational mosques<sup>1</sup> of the first centuries of Islam.

According to Caetani,<sup>2</sup> the building erected by the Prophet was intended at the outset, in his own mind, for his personal and private use; but it assumed as time went on—owing to unforeseen circumstances, and by an unconscious process—first of all a public character, and later, after the Master's departure, a sacred character as well, becoming above everything else a real and genuine place of worship.

Lammens,<sup>3</sup> on the other hand, thinks that the mosque or 'masgid' came from the tribal 'maglis,' that is to say, the council-tent, the central point of social life for the individualist Arabs, with its sacred precinct, its far higher degree of inviolability than the ordinary tent, and the greater honour paid to it. This conception would, then, be applied to the Prophet's first abode at Medina, which would thus have become the earliest mosque of Islam and the meeting-place for the Companions. The idea would also be connected with the mosque founded by Sad ibn abi Waqqas at Kufa, which was designed for a place of meeting, and provided with shelter from extremes of weather.
