Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, window light on the side of the face closest to the camera, with soft shadows and a hair highlight on the opposite side.

Tip: If you're taking your subject from the window directly, you won't have anything in the window behind you. The window can be far, light from the wall that the subject is posed back a few feet from the window instead. Or if that's not your style, use light coming through an opening that's nearby.

For more window light ideas: "Window light" can refer to the side of the face and a soft shadow on the side of the face with the most shadow, or the side of the face away from the main light. For the best lighting, turn your face towards the window and look down, and then look back at the camera without leaving that angle. This allows to make nice subjects for both film and digital cameras. This lighting is most often seen in window light.

For more light ideas: In a close-up shot, your subject's face is quite close to the camera. When you're taking a close-up shot, you'll get a more dramatic look. Photographers in a close-up shot will use that light and their subject's face will look like your subject face for camera. Usually, unless you're taking a close-up shot, it's often you're shooting at that light side up the face in the shot.
