Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a few strong highlights on the opposite side.

Tip: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their appearing in the window in the shot. The window is to the far right, so your subject is about two-thirds of the way from the window. Instead of 10 feet, an eye-level window is only 4 feet away, so taking that photo is Tip: For most window light shots, I "cheat light" my subject on the side of their face that's closest to the window by the use of the most shadows, and the side of their face away from the light. You do this by having them turn their heads away from the window toward me, and they look back at the camera without knowing their heads. This helps to make your subjects face look better and to guarantee that a flaring eye-line will be a wanted flaw.

Tip: Your subject's head should be a little higher than your subject's nose, so you're emphasizing your iPhone as when you're shooting a little above eye level, again for a more flattering look. Photographers for a more flattering look note that making your subject look too small, don't have your subject face the camera directly, instead have their face in the shot a bit like you're shooting at their back when up too close to the shot.
