

already reflected in our current research.

It takes 10 to 15 years to develop a new drug, and while it costs less to develop and market generic drugs, developing them is still a costly business. And making them is often easier said than done, especially when it comes to the manufacturing process. The cost of development often is higher today in part because the amount of research has increased.

The cost of drugs is high because, just as a general rule, the bigger it gets, the more you need to build around it. And if you're concerned that it's more than a couple of dollars, consider this: A bottle of a couple of dollars' worth of insulin is worth one and a half dollars.

As a result, as a company puts a good understanding of what are the alternatives to the generic market, it may change its mind and not develop the drug in the first place. And that's not an option at a time when the industry is expected to grow 10 to 15%.

For the industry, we're not looking for the price to drop. It's not about the price of the drug, it's about the value of the investment. And that's why we're not going to let the government take away the ability to make money on the investment.

But, as it stands, it's not possible to make money. It's not possible to get the value of the drug to be a dollar. And that's why, for the time being, we're not going to let the government take away the ability to make money.

The industry is not going to let the government take away the ability to make money. It's not about the price of the drug, it's about the value of the investment. And that's why we're not going to let the government take away the ability to make money on the investment.

IMMUNIZATION FROM THE '90S

I have to believe that the industry is not going to let the government take away the ability to make money on the investment. And that's why we're not going to let the government take away the ability to make money on the investment.

IMMUNIZATION

IMMUNIZATION

One of the most interesting things I've seen in the industry is the fact that the industry is not going to let the government take away the ability to make money on the investment. And that's why we're not going to let the government take away the ability to make money on the investment.

IMMUNIZATION

It's not about the price of the drug, it's about the value of the investment. And that's why we're not going to let the government take away the ability to make money on the investment.
