Pabenger To Teheran:

Passenger to Teheran Vita Sackville-West, 2021-02-02 In 1926 Vita Sackville West travelled to Iran to visit her husband Harold Nicolson who was serving as a diplomat in Teheran Her route was deliberately slow paced she stopped in Egypt where she sailed up the Nile to Luxor and India where she visited New Delhi and Agra before sailing across the Persian Gulf to Iraq and on through bandit infested mountains to Teheran She returned to England in an equally circuitous manner and despite travelling under dangerous circumstances through communist Russia and Poland in the midst of revolution her humour and sense of adventure never failed Passenger to Teheran is a classic work revealing the lesser known side of one of the twentieth century's most luminous authors Travel Literature Reconsidered Brianna Elizabeth Hyslop, 2011 The critical attention that has been given to Vita Sackville West's travel literature has primarily focused on the relationships between these texts and the novels of Virginia Woolf on account of the intimate relationship that existed between the two writers I argue in this paper that Sackville West's travel accounts are worthy of study in and of themselves This report explores the ways that the genre of travel literature was changing in the early twentieth century through Vita Sackville West's Passenger to Teheran 1926 Critics such as Marie Louise Pratt have noted that eighteenth and nineteenth century British travel accounts had been used as a way to transmit technical knowledge of and authority over the East Sackville West's text throws this tradition of the genre into question through its focus on the traveler's subjectivity Working from Michel de Certeau's ideas regarding railway travel and incarceration I want to demonstrate that the traveler's subjectivity is augmented by her position as a passenger in various modes of mobility Ultimately I argue that the privileging of imagination and subjectivity over scientific knowledge found in Passenger to Teheran unravels the traditional epistemology of travel writing which positions the traveler as an authority figure on the East and instead positions Sackville West as a traveler aesthete This shift in the role of the travel writer reveals that while Pratt's description characterizes some travel writing Sackville West's travel project is more concerned with discovering the creative potential that travel can stimulate in the mind rather than purporting to reveal facts about the outside world Passenger to Teheran Victoria Sackville-West, 1943
