

LOW COST - HIGH TECH HANDS-ON EXPERIMENTS

Bodo Eckert, Hans-Jörg Jodl

Department of Physics, University of Kaiserslautern (Germany)

Motivation

In recent years a variety of new materials and techniques have found their way into day-to-day life and into the hands of pupils, e.g. audio-CDs, cellular phones, remote controls etc. In contrast to this tendency, no experimentally and methodically equivalent approach can be claimed in teaching - in terms of the full-scale implementation of new materials and techniques into teaching as well as in terms of a straightforward and cost-saving approach. The objective of this workshop is to give examples of low cost experiments with a high tech background. It will further be explained how these experiments can be integrated into the classical collection of low cost experiments.

Hands on experiments are not a recent phenomenon. Hands on experiments were known rather as magic tricks, where astonishment and entertainment were favoured to the explanation and the understanding of the physics behind the experiment. It was in the 19th century that the 'classical' hands on experiment found its way into teaching. The quality of the experiment was merely determined by the teacher's choice of materials and instruments (from day-to-day life). Since then, the classical definition of hands on experiment has been as an experiment that is based on the use of day-to-day gadgets or simple setups which can very easily be assembled.

The overall number of books at the American, English and German market dealing with hands on experiments and their application in educational physics has been estimated to be around 50. Some of these books also cover how toys or other low budget gadgets can be implemented into teaching physics. A good part of these 50 books can be seen as a mere enumeration of experiments. Only 15 of these books are available to the public (e.g. (1-7), a more complete list is available from us (8)). However, the number of articles in magazines and journals about teaching, which give further ideas for hands on experiments, approaches about one thousand - in English as well as in German. The articles are however unsystematically distributed in the literature. Our main point of criticism is the fact that most of the experiments, when tested, did not work out; the descriptions contain not even a simple schematic diagram on how to set up the experiment, they give only qualitative results or deal with very special cases instead of the broader phenomena. For the most part, a discussion of the historic development of hands on experiments to their modern form (with new materials and day-to-day items) is practically non-existent.

Physics is among the least liked subjects in today's schools in Germany as well as in other countries. The reasons for this have been addressed by pupils and teachers alike: too much mathematics, no obvious relation to day-to-day life, only a small number of experiments (which are then conducted by the teacher, not by the pupils), and too much scribbled writing on the blackboard instead of practical work.
