

Modern Reconstruction of State Government

By PAUL T. STAFFORD

AMERICAN state government is today in transition. It has entered an era of sweeping reorganization, a period of fundamental change. Slowly but surely its traditional pattern is being revised and reconstructed along lines that are entirely new. At every hand, time-honored customs and methods are being altered or wholly discarded in favor of new instruments and techniques of action. Already there can be seen the emerging outlines of a new governmental framework, within which the modern functions of state government may be more expeditiously and effectively discharged.

TRENDS IN GOVERNMENT

To be properly understood, the modern movement for reconstruction of state government must be visualized against a background of current major trends in government. The outstanding political phenomenon of the twentieth century in this country is the enormous expansion of governmental responsibility and action. The so-called "Social Service State" is the direct product of modern economic and social change. Modern repercussions of the industrial revolution are rendering more and more insecure the economic and social status of great masses of the population. These individuals must perforce look increasingly to resources other than their own for aid, guidance, or even total support. Quite naturally they have turned to government. Under the pressure of the tremendous popular insistence for public service which these conditions have created, governments everywhere and at all levels are being forced to embark upon huge programs of public benefits. New responsibilities of unprecedented scope are being assumed, and a vast network of public agencies is being erected to perform the duties which these responsibilities entail. Governments generally in this country are becoming in fact as well as in theory the principal underwriters of the economic and social well-being of the individual. Once confined largely to the rôle of policing the community, to the task of protecting one's rights from infringement by others, they are now directing their principal energies to the active betterment of the individual's circumstance.

In this general enlargement of public authority the states have been major participants. The more obvious expansion of the responsibilities of the National Government, especially in recent years, has tended to obscure this profoundly important development. It is of course common knowledge that within recent years this trend, which had previously begun on all levels of government, has been swiftly accelerated in the national sphere by virtue of a vigorous political leadership and a liberal reinterpretation of the National Government's constituent powers. But the states also and at the same time have enjoyed an enormous increase in power and influence. It is only necessary here to point out that in recent decisions, such as those upholding state minimum wage and unemployment compensation legislation, final judicial approval has been granted to a great expansion of state activity in the general field of social welfare, that in-
