Highlights

A total of 2,443,489 couples married in the United States in 1990, a 2-percent increase over the number for 1989 (2,403,268) and the highest number since 1984. The rate of marriage in 1990 (9.8 per 1,000 population) was also slightly higher than in 1989 (9.7). However, provisional data indicate that the increase in the number and rate of marriages was temporary and declined each year from 1991 to 1993.

First marriage rates were highest for men and women in their mid- and late-20's. Single (never married) women ages 25-29 were more than 5 times as likely to marry in 1990 as single women 40-44 years of age and 14 times as likely to marry as single women ages 50-54. The drop by age was not as steep for men as for women. Single men ages 25-29 were approximately four times as likely to marry as single men 40-44 years of age and eight times as likely to marry as single men ages 50-54. Marriage rates were very low for single men and women in age groups over 55 years. About a quarter of divorced men and women 20-24 years of age remarried in 1990.

The marriage rates for previously divorced men and women consistently declined with additional age.

The age distribution of brides and grooms shifted to older ages during the 1970's and 1980's. In 1990 proportionately fewer brides and grooms were under 25 years of age when they first married and more brides and grooms were between 25 and 39 years of age than in 1970.

The median age of previously single brides was 24.0 years, about 10 years younger than the median age for previously divorced brides and 30 years younger than the median age for previously widowed brides. Previously single grooms were 10.5 years younger than previously divorced grooms and about 37 years younger than previously widowed grooms. Since 1970 the median age for previously single and widowed brides has increased by about 3 years, while the median age for previously divorced
