

Mercy Otis Warren Opposes the Constitution

Opponents of the new Constitution criticized its provisions and its process, often charging them with subverting the achievements of the American Revolution. The debate in Massachusetts about ratification of the constitution prompted Mercy Otis Warren, a member of a distinguished family of revolutionary leaders who traced their origins back to the Mayflower, to publish her Observations on the New Constitution in 1788 under the pseudonym, "Cassandra Dutton." A brilliant and exceptionally well-educated woman who had been extensively publishing plays, poems, and essays for fifteen years, Warren argued that the Constitution's process sought to undermine liberties that Americans had only recently enjoyed from British misgovernment. Like other Anti-Federalists, Warren condemned specific constitutional provisions to discern Federalists' assumptions about popular government. Her Observations describe Anti-Federalists' deep suspicion of the Constitution, its supporters, and their exact deliberations and busy plan for ratification.

Observations on the New Constitution, 1788

Accustomed with the firmest zeal for the interest of this country, the power and union of the American States, and the freedom and happiness of a people who have made the most costly sacrifices in the cause of liberty, — who have braved the power of Britain, weakened the contributions of war, and washed thro' the blood of friends and foes to establish their independence and to support the freedom of the human mind . . . obliges every one to interpose against the studies of ambition, and a wretched kind of despotism, and to make the first approaches of tyranny, which at this day threaten to sweep away the rights for which the brave sons of America have fought with an heroic scarcely paralleled even in ancient republics. . . . On these solemn freedom has planted her standard, [labeled] in the purple title that flowed from the robes of her austerest heroes, and here every uncorrupted American yet hopes to see it supported by the vigour, the justice, the wisdom and unanimity of the people, in spite of the deep-laid plots, the secret intrigues, or the bold effrontery of those interested and avowed adherents for place, who insinuated with the ideas of distinction and predoment, have projected every worthy principle beneath the dictate of ambition. Yet these are the men who tell us republicanism is degraded into theory — that we are incapable of enjoying our liberties — and that we must have a master. . . . [The] Constitution, which, by the undivided consent of some parts, and the ambiguousness of expression in others, is dangerously adapted to the purposes of an inviolable aristocratic tyranny, that faces the difficulty, if not impracticability of its execution, must even terminate in the most uncontrolled despotism. . . .

And it is with inexpressible anxiety that many of the best friends to the Union of the States — to the peaceable and equal participation of the rights of nature, and to the glory and dignity of this country, behold the insidious arts, and the enormous effects of the purchase of arbitrary power, by their vague definitions of the best established truths, endeavoring to envelope the mind in darkness the conceit of slavery, and to lock the strong chains of domestic despotism on a country, which by the most glorious and successful struggle is but newly emancipated from the yoke of foreign domination. . . .

I will not expatiate long on a Republican form of government, founded on the principles of necessity — a democratic branch with the persona of a wise man — and the entire neglect of nobility prevailing the minds of many of the time is urging the necessity of government, from the embarrassments of trade — the want of respectability abroad and confidence in the public, engendered at home — There are obvious truths which no one denies, and there are few who do not unite in the general wish for the restoration of public liberty, the revival of commerce, arts, agriculture, and industry, under a better, peaceable and energetic government but the most sagacious advocates for the party have not by fair discussion, and rational argumentation, revived the necessity of adopting this many-headed monster . . . nor have its friends the courage to denounce it a Monarchy, an Aristocracy, or an Oligarchy, and the favored handful must have passed through the short period of its existence without a name, had not Mr. James Wilson, in the fertility of his genius, suggested the happy epithet of a Federal Republic. . . .

[1.] It will be allowed by every one that the fundamental principle of a free government, is the equal representation of a free people. . . . And when society has thus deposited a certain number of their equals to take care of their personal rights, and the interest of the whole community, it must be considered that responsibility is the great security of liberty and honour, and that annual election principles of annual elections with a provision, that cannot be controverted, though they may be distorted, by the sophistical arguments that have been thrown out with design, to undermine all the liberties of freedom.

2. There is no security in the present system, either for the rights of commerce, or the liberty of the Press. Despotism usually while it is gaining ground, will suffer men to think, say, or write what they please; but when once established, if it is thought necessary to subvert the purposes of arbitrary power, the most unjust restrictions may take place in the first instance, and an imprudent on the Press in the next, may silence the complaints, and forbid the most decent maintenance of an injured and oppressed people.

3. There are no well defined limits of the Judiciary Powers . . . and as they cannot be comprehended by the clearest capacity, or the most sagacious mind, it would be an Herculean labour to attempt to describe the dangers with which they are rife.

4. The Executive and the Legislative are so dangerously blended as to give just cause of alarm, and every thing relative thereto, is couched in such ambiguous terms — in such vague and indistinct expressions, as is a sufficient ground without any other objections, for the repudiation of a system. . . .

5. The abolition of trial by jury in civil causes. . . . [I] shall this inextinguishable privilege be relinquished in America — either thro' the fear of inspection for
