Scientists Urge Bigger Supply Of Stem Cells

Report Backs Cloning to Create New Lines

By MICHAEL J. SAWARD
A national debate began this week over whether scientists should be allowed to grow new colonies of human embryonic stem cells, and the answer may well depend on the results of an election in November. In addition, the political debate over stem-cell cloning has led to a proposal to ban the practice in Massachusetts, and the state's legislature is considering a bill that would ban it.

In a largely report this morning, the House of Representatives voted to ban the use of federal funds for cloning human embryos, but the bill must be voted on again before it can be signed into law. The House version of the bill, introduced by Representative Henry Waxman of California, has been amended to ban the use of federal funds for cloning any human cell, and not just of embryos, reflecting the original intent of the legislation.

The proposal by the House's House ways and means committee, which has been more conservative in its approach to stem-cell research, is a departure from the House's previous position. In February, a House committee voted to ban federal funding for cloning any human cell, though the proposal did not mention funding for stem-cell research.

Both approaches are likely to prevail in the remaining 10 months of Congress, and the country is out of what was perceived as the first major crisis for congressional supporters of stem-cell research.

To the House, "Keep it simple."
