Evaluation of a Multi-method Group Treatment Approach for the Management of Stress Steven Hall Tallant,1985 The purpose of this dissertation was twofold First to evaluate the treatment effectiveness of a stress management package Second to examine the role of social support as a significant external factor in reducing stress symptomatology It was hypothesized that subjects receiving treatment would obtain significantly greater decreases in stress than subjects in a waiting list condition Also it was hypothesized that wait list subjects with high levels of social support would obtain significant greater decreases in stress than wait list subjects with low levels of social support A matched pair randomized block design was used Thirty two subjects were rank ordered on a measure of social support matched according to level of social support and randomized into either treatment or wait list condition The statistical and clinical results demonstrate the contribution of the stress management package in reducing stress when compared to no treatment intervention On three of four dependent measures the treatment subjects evidenced significant pre posttest reductions in stress compared to the wait list subjects There were no significant differences between wait list subjects with high social support and low social support In fact the low social support subjects improved markedly when compared to the high social support subjects These results suggest that the assumed benefits derived from social support may not be accurate
