Adoption and the Care of Children Patricia M. Morgan, 1998 Adoption is out of favour Numbers have fallen dramatically and baby adoptions have become rare events Recent trends in family law make it increasingly unlikely that children will ever be declared free to be adopted while would be adopters are discouraged by a series of obstacles and abjections Consequently children who are unable to live with their natural parents are likely to spend long periods possibly their entire childhoods in care This can entail years of to ing and fro ing between children s homes foster parents and repeated attempts to reunite them with neglectful and often abusive parents. The results for the children concerned are extremely poor and all the evidence suggests that the state makes a very bad substitute parent. Children who have spent time in care are more prone to psychiatric disorders; they suffer in terms of education and health and they often graduate from the system to homelessness, unemployment and prison. The results for adopted children on the other hand are extremely good. They do well by all measures. When they experience problems, these often relate to their early childhood trauma at the hands of their natural parents or to long periods spent in care prior to adoption. In this book Patricia Morgan argues that childcare legislation and practice should be reorganised so that adoption becomes the first not the last option for children who cannot live with their parents. A child welfare system for the twenty-first century should be built around finding a permanent home for every child.

Trauma, Attachment and Family Permanence Caroline Archer, 2003-02-15 Fostered and adopted children can present major challenges resulting from unresolved attachment issues and early traumatic experiences. This book provides a variety of complementary perspectives on the needs of these children and their families, focusing on ways of integrating attachment theory and developmental psychology into effective practice.
