SAIGO TAKAMORI

Saigo Takamori was a general of the Satsuma domain, whose common name was Kichisaburō, and whose literary name Naishi. He was brave and silent, prompt in decision, and dauntless in danger. His form was dignified, his eyes were sharp and glittering; he was extremely different from his youth, and when grown a man, was loved and feared by young folks. Just then the last Tokugawa Shōgunate began to decline; a man faithful to the real Emperor in Kyoto arose everywhere, speaking against the authority of the Shōgunate. Saigo also came to Kyoto (Imperial city) secretly, and took sides with the "loyalty leaders" (Ninjō) with other eminent loyalists (Kōzōshi). He was especially intimate with the priest Genshō of the Kiyomizu temple, who was greatly favored by the Emperor's highest minister Prince Kōno, and thus was able to have communication with the Court. Seeing this movement of the loyalists, the Shōgunate was somewhat troubled, and ordered Matsue a member of the Council of State at Yedo, and Sakai the governor of the Imperial city (Kyoto), to arrest all the suspicious men belonging to the Court nobles, and those retainers who were loyalists.

Saigo and Genshō, seeing that they had also been put under the ban, escaped to Akamatsu Field, and hid themselves in the house of Shinschi, one of the loyalists. After some time Saigo went alone to Hiranoya, leaving the priest there, in order to prepare a hiding-place for him. But before his return, Genshō started from there, and, going to Chikuzen, concealed himself in the house of Hirano Jirō, who was also a loyalist. But as the Shōgunate searched for him with vigor, Hirano took him to Satsuma; but the boundary guards of Satsuma did not allow them to enter the province, because they joined the Shōgun. Now Saigo, finding no hiding-place for the priest and for himself, decided with him to die in the sea. They took a vessel under the pretext of going to Himeji by sea, aboard of which Hirano also was. They embarked; but as Saigo and Genshō was talking and running about in the prow of the vessel, Hirano kept himself quiet in the interior of it, where suddenly a splashing sound of water was heard, which induced him to run towards the bow. He came, but alas! they were not there! They had already sunk to the bottom of the sea. He was disconsolate for a while. But after some time, their corpses rose to the surface of the water floating. They were instantly drawn up. Genshō was dead, but Saigo came to life again.

Then Saigo changed his name into Kikuchi Gōgei, and hid himself in some place; but soon being detected, was transported to the island of Oshima off the coast of Satsuma by his lord. This was the third time that he was banished to that island, away for the same crime—crime which was soon changed into honor. Saigo now changed his
