

How institutional management is developed

The political objectives for the institutional structures of the self-governing institution areas are to ensure broad educational environments with a range of options for young people and adults in all regions, and that the institutions should be able to bear the independent, decentralised responsibility for educational opportunities and development, as well as the pedagogical development. The primary aim is therefore to ensure a high level of educational quality and broad geographic coverage throughout the country.

In the case of post-compulsory education programmes, management of the educational options is to ensure that these programmes are available locally for all young people such that they have the possibility for commencing and, to the greatest possible extent, completing an education without having to move away from home.

The capacity of the programmes is generally more limited than with the post-compulsory programmes. At the same time, however, emphasis is placed on achieving regional coverage in terms of the educational options, partly with regard to the possibilities for maintaining attractive educational alternatives for young people in all regions, and partly in order to support regional business development.

Having educational institutions in the outlying areas is of great importance for business development. It is also to assist in attaining the political objective of having as many young people as possible complete an education.

However, experience with small institutions in local areas offering a small variety of educational programmes has shown that the local educational institutions have found it difficult to attract young people, who would rather seek out the larger and multi-
