Organ Transplantation

Transplantation

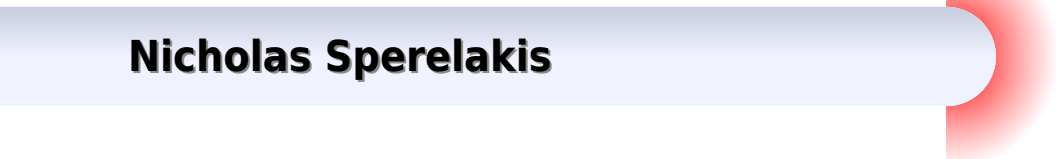

Transplantation is the process of replacing a damaged or diseased organ with a healthy one from another individual. This procedure is used to treat various conditions, including heart failure, kidney failure, liver failure, and certain types of cancer. The success of transplantation depends on several factors, including the quality of the donor organ, the skill of the surgeon, and the patient's overall health.

There are two main types of transplantation: autotransplantation and allogeneic transplantation. Autotransplantation involves taking a patient's own organ and reimplanting it. Allogeneic transplantation involves taking an organ from a donor and implanting it in a recipient. The most common types of allogeneic transplantation are kidney transplantation, liver transplantation, and heart transplantation.

Transplantation is a complex procedure that requires careful planning and coordination. It is a life-saving procedure for many patients, but it also carries risks, including rejection, infection, and the need for lifelong medication.
