Mind Reading:

Everyday Mind Reading William Ickes, 2010-01-28 Are women really better than men at reading other people's minds? Are longer married couples better than newlyweds at anticipating their partners' thoughts and feelings? Do we all possess a dormant sixth sense that, if fully utilized, could allow us to intuit with great accuracy what other people are thinking? Internationally recognized psychologist William Ickes answers these and many other questions in this fascinating examination of the mind's potential for everyday mind reading. After developing an innovative video-based procedure for measuring the accuracy of people's empathic inferences, Ickes and his colleagues used this procedure to study different aspects of everyday mind reading in research conducted over the past 15 years. Among the issues they have explored are the validity of the belief in women's intuition, how long it takes strangers to get to know each other, why friendships promote mutual understanding, why twins tend to have similar thoughts and feelings, how people's frames of reference can both help and hinder their communication, and the neurological basis for our ability to empathize with others. Ickes also extends his inquiry to broader social questions. For example, are there ways of detecting when someone has a hidden agenda? Are there circumstances in which accurately reading an intimate partner's thoughts and feelings actually harms rather than helps the relationship? How can the results of the research on everyday mind reading be applied to improve parenting skills, the effectiveness of counseling, even sales and marketing? Finally, what does the scientific evidence say about the widely debated notion of ESP?

Mindreading Animals

Robert W. Lurz, 2011 Animals live in a world of other minds human and nonhuman and their well being and survival often depends on what is going on in the minds of these other creatures But do animals know that other creatures have minds And how would we know if they do In Mindreading Animals Robert Lurz offers a fresh approach to the hotly debated question of mental state attribution in nonhuman animals Some empirical researchers and philosophers claim that some animals are capable of anticipating other creatures behaviors by interpreting observable cues as signs of underlying mental states others claim that animals are merely clever behavior readers capable of using such cues to anticipate others behaviors without interpreting them as evidence of underlying mental states Lurz argues that neither position is compelling and proposes a way to move the debate and the field forward Lurz offers a bottom up model of mental state attribution that is built on cognitive abilities that animals are known to possess rather than on a preconceived view of the mind applicable to mindreading abilities in humans Lurz goes on to describe an innovative series of new experimental protocols for animal mindreading research that show in detail

how various types of animals from apes to monkeys to ravens to dogs can be tested for perceptual state and belief attribution
