Window Light Portraits

Opposite page: Dark, natural light on the side of the building creates a dramatic look, with all windows and a few sun lights on the opposite side.

At right: By not having your subject face the window directly, you can then position the camera to the right. This creates a dramatic light that appears to come from the side, rather than from the opposite window. In effect, it's a very bright window on one side and a very dark window on the other.

At the bottom you see a light subject ("Window light") was taken at the side of their face with a camera that is oriented to the side with the window directly across from them. This gives one side of the face more light by having the opposite side receive the most direct sunlight. Position your hands and the person's clothing so that they are able to block the sun's rays from the face. Notice the soft shadow and a square cast shadow on the left from the window light.

At this point you should be a few steps from your subject now, so you're preparing to shoot. Make sure your phone is held steady, open the camera, and then tap the shutter. As you follow the sun, the side that your subject had was white, should have been colored. See how strong shadow caused this to be on the side of the face you just about to take this shot of the person in the shot.
