Window Light Portraits

Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a few highlights on the opposite side.

Tip: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their appearing in the window in the shot. The window is to the far left of the frame, and your subject is about two-thirds of the way from the window. Instead of 10 feet, an 8-foot window might work through an 8-foot wall.

For most window light shots, I "cheat light" my subject on the side of their face that's closest to the window by the use of the most shadows, and the side of their face that's furthest from the light. You do this by having them turn their heads towards the side that's furthest from the light, so their face is in the shadows without losing their smile. This helps to make your subjects feel more relaxed and is generally more flattering. It's how I've been a model for years.

Also: Your subject's head should be a little higher than your subject's torso, so you're capturing your iPhone at an angle, creating a little more of them, again for a more flattering look. Photograph for a more flattering look that makes your subject look like a model. Don't have your subject face the camera directly, instead have them turn to the side a bit (like you're doing) so their face takes up less space in the shot.
