Nontraditional Database Systems:

Nontraditional Database Systems Yahiko Kambayashi, Katsumi Tanaka, Masaru Kitsuregawa, Akifumi Makinouchi, Shunsuke Uemura, Yoshifumi Masunaga, 2003-09-02 Nontraditional Database Systems is the fifth volume in the Advanced Information Processing Technology series. It brings together the results of research carried out by the Japanese database research community in the field of nontraditional database systems. The book examines nontraditional types of applications, data types, systems and environments together with high performance architecture to support nontraditional applications such as web mining, data engineering and object processing. Physical Design for Non-relational Data Systems Michael J. Mior, 2018 Decades of research have gone into the optimization of physical designs, query execution and related tools for relational databases. These techniques and tools make it possible for non-expert users to make effective use of relational database management systems. However, the drive for flexible data models and increased scalability has spawned a new generation of data management systems which largely eschew the relational model. These include systems such as NoSQL databases and distributed analytics frameworks such as Apache Spark which make use of a diverse set of data models. Optimization techniques and tools developed for relational data do not directly apply in this setting. This leaves developers making use of these systems with the need to become intimately familiar with system details to obtain good performance. We present techniques and tools for physical design for non-relational data systems. We explore two settings: NoSQL database systems and distributed analytics frameworks. While NoSQL databases often avoid explicit schema definitions, many choices on how to structure data remain. These choices can have a significant impact on application performance. The data structuring process normally requires expert knowledge of the underlying database. We present the NoSQL Schema Evaluator NoSE. Given a target workload, NoSE provides an optimized physical design for NoSQL database applications which compares favourably to schemas designed by expert users. To enable existing applications to benefit from conceptual modeling, we also present an algorithm to recover a logical model from a denormalized database instance. Our second setting is distributed analytics frameworks such as Apache Spark. As is the case for NoSQL databases, expert knowledge of Spark is often required to construct efficient data pipelines. In NoSQL systems, a key challenge is how to structure stored data; while in Spark, a key challenge is how to cache intermediate results. We examine a particularly common scenario in Spark which involves performing iterative analysis on an input dataset. We show that jobs written in an intuitive manner using existing Spark APIs can have poor performance. We propose ReSpark which automates caching decisions for iterative Spark analyses. Like NoSE, ReSpark makes it possible for non-expert users to obtain good performance from a non-relational data system.

No Relation Ian Thomas Varley, 2009 This paper investigates a new class of database systems loosely referred to as non relational databases which offer a subset of traditional relational database functionality in exchange for improved scalability performance and or simplicity We explore the differences in conceptual modeling techniques and examine both the advantages and limitations of several classes of currently available systems using running examples of real world problems as implemented in both a traditional relational database model as well as several non relational models Analysis and Comparison of Relational Database Systems Patrick Valduriez, Georges Gardarin, 1989 Advanced Database Systems Nabil R.
