Orchard and Small Fruit Culture Eugene Curtis Auchter, 1929 The Memoir of an Orchard Maria Joseph, Chatham University. School of Sustainability and the Environment. Food Studies, 2013 Vines of poison ivy trail up the trunks of these centenarians and dot the landscape beyond the drip line of Yellow Transparents Red Delicious and other undetermined varieties of apples and pears of this orchard in Western Pennsylvania Decades of neglect have failed to rob this small collection of fruit trees of their natural beauty quite possibly adding to its aesthetic character in the same way that decay has added to the beauty of the Roman Forum or faded murals on chapel walls in European churches This is Eden Hall Orchard

This collection of the remaining dozens of trees from what was once a group of nearly eight times that many could surely tell quite a story a story of farming in these gently rolling hills of Pennsylvania nearly an hour north of Pittsburgh a story of tastes and trends of consumers of over one hundred years ago a story of changing weather patterns as early bloom times and unexpected late frosts altered the bushels harvested in late summer through early fall a story of health and disease of prosperous times and a Great Depression But maybe the most important stories of all could be those of education instruction trial error and progress This is a story based in fiction and fact a story told of what was what is and a story of orcharding in our corner of Pennsylvania but with implications and connections beyond Allegheny County But this is not just a story this is a proposal to take what we have learned from our orcharding past and apply those good practices with our sustainable methods of today in order to determine what the role of orcharding might be in a move towards a more environmentally sustainable future One hundred years ago when Sebastian Mueller purchased this farm and decided to settle in this northern tip of Allegheny County as visionary as he was in his role as Heinz executive it is hard to imagine that even he could foretell what would become of these nearly 400 hundred acres of land in Richland Township Pennsylvania A century later this unassuming farm now surrounded by woods fields houses and schools is home to the School of Sustainability and the Environment of Chatham University No longer are these grounds limited to the recreational use of the female employees of the Heinz factory but currently dozens and soon to be hundreds of faculty staff and students will focus their attention on these very trees buildings fields and fauna Their focus is and will be to study and care for the wildlife and habitats through sustainable practices learning to design sustainability within agroecological systems with the hopes that the caretakers and their plants of the coming centuries will have learned and benefitted from those of today The research and suggestions made in this paper are for those who will see Eden Hall s orchard as a resource and to learn from the past s mistakes and positive results and apply those with sustainable methods of orcharding today and into the future The goal is to provide a sense of historical and current practices for farming in an earth friendly environment especially in regards to the very special learning environment to be found at Eden Hall Assisting to narrate this story along with the academic research and conversations with various local farmers is the voice of Eden Hall Orchard The paper is laid out with each section Birth Life Death and Rebirth beginning from the point of view of the orchard hence the memoir As an attempt at a creative non fiction telling of the historical practices of orcharding in Western Pennsylvania the reader will first hear from the orchard s perspective followed by a more traditional style of non fiction writing based on research of conventional and organic orcharding practices 19th century horticulturalists such as U P Hedrick and Fred Sears will aid in the narration of the historical practices of orcharding in North America As the story moves into the 20th and 21st century the work of orchardists and sustainable farmers Michael Phillips Cem Akin David Masumoto and Masanobu Fukuoka supported by the science of Charles Francis and Miguel Altieri help to lay out the argument for a future of sustainably raised fruits The importance of this story of fact and creative non fiction is to share the history of how this significant food and iconic symbol health and knowledge has been created and survived and what is necessary for its continued sustainable production Introduction A Survey of Orchard Practices in the Citrus Industry of Southern California Roland Snow Vaile,1924 Transactions of the Peninsula Horticultural Society Peninsula Horticultural Society,1924 Bulletin United States.
