Pension Peril

The effects of the financial crisis of 2008 and the resultant economic downturn continue to ripple through global markets. Pension plans, both those sponsored by governments and private companies, are now feeling the effects. Consider the following actions by private companies to deal with the effects of the financial crisis:

- Britain's employers are shutting down pension schemes at a rapid rate. A new study has concluded that traditional final salary pension benefits will soon become a thing of the past. The study found that total service cost—the cost of providing the current year's pension promises—had fallen by 15 percent as a result of the shutdown. The drop reflects a decline in the number of workers who are earning pension benefits. At this rate, final salary pensions in the private sector will no longer be available within six years.
- United Utilities (GBR) has made its defined benefit pension schemes less generous to employees as the United Kingdom's biggest listed water company looks to cut costs in the face of a harsher regulatory regime. The utility announced that the move was backed by unions. The company said it had amended the terms of its defined benefit schemes to increase contributions made by members, while also increasing the retirement age and capping increases in pensionable salaries.
- Mark's and Spencer plc (GBR) is planning to increase contributions to its pension plan (£200 million) to address a deficit in the plan assets relative to its pension obligations. The retailer insisted that it had no plans to close the final salary scheme to existing members. The clothing and food chain, which has 20,000 current members in its defined benefits scheme, said it would not be following the growing band of companies—such as BP (GBR) and Vodafone (GBR)—which are closing their final salary schemes to existing members. In fact, recent data indicate that 88 percent of U.K. defined benefit pension plans have closed the door to new participants.

Just as market declines create challenges for companies and their pension plans, market recoveries can quickly reverse the negative consequences of market downturns for pension plans. This is what we are seeing recently, with 27 percent of the 1,000 largest global companies reporting pension plan funded status (which is defined as pension assets minus pension liabilities) of greater than 100 percent in 2013. That means these companies had more assets than liabilities, which is quite a change in two years when just 4.4 percent of these companies reported fully funded or overfunded pension plans. A good example is Mark's and Spencer. As discussed above, it reported a net pension liability or deficit of €253.3 million at the
