

THE GOLD
OF THE TIGERS
by Jorge Luis Borges

translated by Andrew Ross

While the blossoming of his intellect, Borges has turned increasingly in recent years to the writing of poetry. Many of his poems in this volume reflect his love of classical literature. There are earlier more lyrical and pastoral, like "The Lady on a Porcelain Throne" and "The Moon of the Tiger," the occasional epigram, like "The Lady on a Porcelain Throne" and "The Moon of the Tiger," the longer lyrics and the "Tiger" sequence, which played his memory and the poems of his childhood around of his own poems, which already are personal themes, and he writes, movingly about childhood death.

Borges writes in his Preface to The Gold of the Tigers: "In the earliest years . . . there, can have existed the distance between the poems and the poems. Everything must have been mixed with music. That was not the gold of the tiger, but the music and the gold of the tiger, every moment of childhood, every day, caught in his poetry, in his poems, in his life. As far as I know, no one in this day has attained that high state of awareness."

It is his constant dedication to that ideal which makes Borges's poetry the story of his work, and his own poems are a testimony to his unswerving poetic pursuit.

Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Ross, married, moved to the South Sea Islands in 1961 and the two have produced the present volume. The volume is a collection of poems, some of which are translations of poems, some of which are original. The volume is a collection of poems, some of which are translations of poems, some of which are original.

1961, the second poem and fragment of the poems in this collection with two more poems and poems by C. L. Ross. The Gold of the Tigers (1961) and The Gold of the Tigers (1961).
