This paper indicates that the consequences of regional trade agreements for the world trade system may be deceiving an arrangement's apparent virtue may constitute the source of its drawback In a model where governments have political as well as economic motivations I show that a free trade area induces its members to reduce protection against the non members and to do so sufficiently deeply to generate overall trade creation Trade creation amplifies the excluded countries access to the integrating markets but also reduces their extra gains from multilateral liberalization Thus trade creation can reverse the support of the excluded countries to liberalization on a multilateral basis This is more likely to happen when governments outside the free trade area are more responsive to special interests
