Rapidly Deployable Low-cost Traffic Data and Video Collection Device Jory Andrew Schwach, 2009

Transportation practitioners planners and researchers lack the availability of an easily deployable non intrusive portable low cost device for traffic data collection and video recording at intersections and arterials as well as temporary remote surveillance The necessary data usually includes volumes speeds classification turning movements queue size and length conflicting movements and time headways They also include recording of traffic characteristics accidents and other special situations A visual record of traffic characteristics at intersections arterials or other locations can also be used for extensive analysis and research leading to improved safety and control practices In this report the development and demonstration of a low cost practical rapidly deployable video recording and data collection device is presented along with the design deployment and data extraction process Its major advantage at intersections is that only one unit can cover an entire intersection up to 5 lanes per incoming approach wide 20 incoming lanes total which should be sufficient for the overwhelming majority of intersections In addition it has the potential of extracting turning movements automatically including optional lanes through advanced machine vision or radar sensors
