Options for Strategic Military Transportation Systems , 2005 Since the end of World War II the United States has maintained the ability to project combat power rapidly around the globe That ability has been achieved through a dual approach forward basing units overseas in regions of particular importance and fielding longrange strategic transportation systems that can move forces around the world quickly either to reinforce the forward based units or to respond to needs that arise elsewhere Following the Cold War emphasis has shifted away from forward basing and toward increasing the mobility of forces based in the United States In the past 15 years the U S military has cut the number of forward based troops by about half and has improved its strategic transportation capability by fielding such systems as C 17 airlift aircraft and large medium speed roll on roll off ships LMSRs for sealift In addition the Army is largely focusing its current transformation efforts on changing equipment and organization to create units that can be deployed more quickly and easily Nevertheless officials in the Department of Defense DoD seek to increase the speed of military deployments to an even greater degree because the ability to deliver forces to a distant theater in the first few days or weeks of a crisis is seen as critical to ensuring a favorable outcome Options for Strategic Military Transportation Systems David Alan Arthur, United States.
