Learning in Development Co-operation Jerker Carlsson, Lennart Wohlgemuth, 2000 Proceedings of the 10th Australasian Conference on Information Systems ,1999

Technological Learning Gillian M. Marcelle, 2004 This book investigates how individual firms in developing countries undertake technological learning and capability building TCB efforts and explains why some developing country firms are world class and others struggle with these important processes The study concludes that it is internal competencies such as the ability to manage strategic change and develop coherent systems that enable firms in developing countries to effectively navigate technological frontiers the network of global suppliers and weak national innovation systems In particular the ability to strike a strategic balance between developing a diverse range of internal learning routines and managing boundary assets over which they have only partial control is found to be of importance The conceptual framework developed for this study the

TCB system approach draws on a number of intellectual traditions including organizational development strategic management innovation studies development studies and evolutionary theory of the firm Conclusions are drawn using this approach to perform a detailed cross sectional analysis of technological learning in a sample of 26 telecommunication operating companies in Uganda Ghana Tanzania and South Africa By focusing on firms in the services sector rather than in manufacturing the study covers an area that is under researched and identifies many distinctive features of the capability building process It is also able to offer insights on how the majority of firms in developing countries should cope with the challenges of speed and complexity of technological change even when they are not aiming to generate radical innovations at the frontier Technological Learning will be of great interest to a wide ranging audience including science and technology academics scholars and policy makers in developing countries telecommunications managers and executives and organisational management scholars focusing on developing country issues Learning from Starting Points, 1998
