need in politics Some neuroscientists believe that many of our assessments rest on an excess of optimism amounting to a dangerous bias Another school of cognitive scientists sees the main danger in being influenced too much by negative conclusions Although these competing perspectives have been only rarely investigated Laqueur argues that such psychological factors play a decisive role in the assessment of political trends and they should Laqueur also reminds readers that there is a connection between writing history and commenting on current affairs but it is not remotely as close and simple as often thought The idea that the historian is somehow better qualified than others to interpret the present let alone predict the future is certainly not borne out by the evidence Some great historians have been good and reliable political commentators others have been miserable failures Laqueur definitely falls in the former camp as these reflections attest
