

THE ROLE OF STORY-MAKING IN DISCLOSURE WRITING: THE PSYCHOMETRICS OF NARRATIVE

ANNA GRAYBEAL*, JANEL D. SEXTON and JAMES W. PENNEBAKER†

Department of Psychology, The University of Texas, Austin, TX 78712

Writing about self-relevant emotional topics has a wide range of mental and physical health benefits. An appealing explanation for this phenomenon is that writing facilitates "story-making" — the ability to make coherent and meaningful stories out of events in one's life — and it is forming a good story that promotes the health benefits. Despite the recent attention to this idea, the psychometrics and correlates of story-making are not known. The purpose of the current study was to explore this idea by measuring participants' story-making ability when writing about both emotional and nonemotional topics and relate this to health, personality variables, and linguistic dimensions. Story-making was reliably assessed by independent raters, except for nonemotional topics. The ability to make good stories was not, however, consistent across topic, and story-making did not correlate with personality dimensions nor did it predict the health outcomes of participants.

Keywords: Story-making; Psychometrics

Writing about emotional topics has been demonstrated to have a wide range of benefits, including reduction in doctor visits, improved immune system functioning, achievement of better grades, and faster acquisition of a new job (see Pennebaker, 1997 and Smyth, 1998 for reviews). Various theories about the mechanisms by which writing exerts its positive effects have been proposed, including an inhibition theory and a cognitive change theory. Both theories are derived from the ideas that writing helps relieve the stress or other difficulties associated with not disclosing or that it helps making sense of a chaotic emotional experience.

The inhibition theory is based on the assumption that not disclosing important psychological experiences is a form of inhibition, which requires physiological work. This physiological work has been hypothesized to be a long-term stressor which may cause or exacerbate psychosomatic processes leading to illness or ineffective functioning (Pennebaker, 1989). In support of this theory, research suggests that individuals who do not naturally talk about their emotions to others may benefit more than those who are more naturally open. For example, a meta-analysis of writing studies by Smyth (1998) suggests that men may benefit more from writing than women.
