Main Trends In History:

Main Trends in History Geoffrey Barraclough, 1979 The vast social and political upheaval of the Second World War inaugurated a new era of historical studies History as a discipline exploded in numerous new directions as young historians questioned inherited concepts and approaches that no longer seemed relevant Geoffrey Barraclough in this thoughtful overview of the present state of the historian's craft summarizes the development and assesses the ferment that has characterized historical studies in the last three decades There has been first of all a search for new concepts and methodologies that transcend national boundaries and ideologies Borrowing ideas from the disciplines of sociology anthropology psychology and economics historians have found vital intercultural links heretofore unseen while embracing the need for a more scientific approach to the past The development of new historical techniques derived from the social sciences has also increased the possibilities of understanding the past but has also increased the complexities of historical knowledge We have arrived as Barraclough observes at the age of team work where major projects are of such scope that many minds are needed to carry them out The present vitality of Historical investigation has also immensely broadened our definition of history Publisher
