

SMITHSONITE

Smithsonite is the most beautiful of all malachite specimens from anywhere in the world and grows in many places around the world. The color comes from trace amounts of copper in the mineral malachite from the earth's crust. It is a rare green color and is found in many places around the world. It was first discovered in 1845 by James Smithson, a British chemist, who was looking for a variety of malachite. The mineral is a very rare mineral and is perhaps the most famous example of the variety, showing deep color, interesting textures, interesting crystal shapes, and a fine large grouping of crystals.
