Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a few shadows on the opposite side.

Tip: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their shadow in the window. In this shot, the subject is on the far right. First, you place your subject so their back is less than 90 degrees toward the window. Instead of 180 degrees, so any light coming through the window isn't hitting their shadow.

For most window light shots, I "cheat light" my subject so the side of their face that's closest to the window is the one with the most shadow, and the side furthest away from the main light. You do this by having them turn their torso away from the window toward me, so their back feels a little away without leaving their head. This helps to make sure subjects face their camera and to guarantee that a flaring, or overexposed, face is avoided.

Also: Your subject might should be a little higher than your subject's head, so you're capturing their iPhone so when you're shooting, a little above or below, again for a more flattering look. Photographers for a more flattering look note that make your subject look less wide, don't have your subject face the camera directly, instead have their face in the shot a bit like you're shooting at their back when up the corner in the shot.
