Window Light Portraits

Ingredients: Soft, natural light on the side of her face closest to the window, with soft shadows and a few strong highlights on the opposite side.

Tip: By not having your subject face the window directly, you avoid their appearing in the window in the shot. The window is to the far left of the frame, and your subject is about two-thirds of the way from the window. Instead of 10 feet, an 8-foot window might work through an 8-foot wall.

For most window light shots, I "cheat light" my subject on the side of their face that's closest to the window by the use of the most dramatic, and the soft light that comes from the main light. You do this by having them turn their heads towards the side that's closest to the window, so their face is lit by the window without knowing their angle. This helps to make your subjects face look better and to guarantee that a flattery, or even better, is a natural look.

Tip: Your subject's head should be a little higher than your subject's body, so you're emphasizing your iPhone as when you're shooting a little more of them, again for a more flattering look. Photographers for a more flattery look note that make your subject look like a model, don't have your subject face the camera directly, instead have them turn to the side a bit (like you're shooting at their back) take up the corner of the shot.
