Window Light Portraits

Opposite page: Dark, natural light on the side of the lighthouse in the morning, with all windows open to let in as much light as the opposite side.

10. Light is not always your enemy when the window blinds are open. When you're in the process of taking a portrait, the window is on the right, you can open your shades to reveal bright light from the opposite window or blinds, or any bright window directly across the room, and it's that simple.

11. For most window-light photos, "natural light" was taken at the side of your face with a camera that's oriented to the sun with the blinds drawn, so the sun follows you as you move. But for me, by taking the opposite side, the sun follows me as I move, and it's a much more dramatic and dynamic method, making it easier to create a more energetic face that's either a square or a square with flaring sides like those in the second photo.

12. This second photo should be a few hours after your sunrise time, or even in the evening, when it's easier to shoot a few hours after, right? Right. Because with the window blinds open, the light from your window has to travel through the window, and that light will be much, much more muted than the strong, direct morning light that's been hitting the side of the lighthouse for the last few hours, or the last few hours of the day.
